The old, familiar values are exposed to new challenges: from the modern, 'London' way of thinking which the Crawfords bring to Mansfield, and from the new forms of human relationship associated with the naval community in Persuasion. In these new contexts, both Austen's heroines are vulnerable to an acute sense of displacement or homelessness.

The serious Jane Austen: Mansfield Park and Persuasion ...

This article proposes that in Mansfield Park (1814) and Persuasion (1818), Austen gothicizes the very interiority that her heroines have cultivated as an apparent refuge. Austen's portrayal of interiority and its implications for feminism have already been complicated by many critics, but this article demonstrates that Austen herself was well aware of how female interiority could become a trap, a place into which a woman might be forced and cut off from others as assuredly as she would be in ...
